—Most every one has noticed the unusual brightness of the sunsets lately. The phenomenon is due to what is known as a "cry fog." In the United States this frequently occurs in November or the latter part of October, commonly known as Indian summer. This appearance is characterized by a hazy appearance of the atmosphere, a redness of the sky, absence of rain, and a mild temperature. This appears to result from a dry and stagnant state of the atmosphere, during which the air, particularly the upper portion, becomes filled with dust and smoke arising from numerous fires, by which its transparency is greatly impaired. A general rain cleans out these impurities. This phenomenon is not peculiar to the United States, being frequently observed in Europe. During long periods of drought in summer, the same peculiar appearance of the sky is observed.
